TRI-CITY TALES: HOG HEAVEN

In mid-May, someone called animal control after finding a box of abandoned chicks in a parking lot. There were four of them, a fast-growing breed, likely purchased from a feed store. Staff suspected they had been part of someone's Easter basket surprise, now unwanted with the holiday behind them.

Tri-City Animal Shelter doesn't have the means to keep chickens indefinitely, so director Tammy Miller called Pam and Michael Petty. The Pettys tend a flock of backyard hens accustomed to watermelon snacks in summer, a heated coop in winter, evening lawn strolls, and daily treats of freeze-dried fly larvae. Miller texted to ask if they might have room for four more. Yes, the Pettys said. When you already have a couple dozen, what's a few more?

When Pam and Mike arrived, Miller also mentioned a dog found that day in Duncanville. The Pettys are known for attracting rescues, especially mutts with rough beginnings. "Anything that looks like it needs a bit of a jump start," says Mike. They already had seven dogs, enough to require a special multi-pet permit with the City of Cedar Hill. While each dog has a bed, five prefer snuggling at night with their humans. The way the dogs see it, that's what a king-sized mattress is for.

Before leaving with the chickens, they met the new arrival. His hair was so overgrown it was hard to tell one end from the other. Under the tangled mass, he appeared to be a teacup poodle. He seemed like a sweet soul who had been alone far too long. When you already have seven dogs, what's one more?

Still, Waldo, as they named him, would need to blend with the Petty pack. They brought him home a week later. He quickly fit in with the other dogs, and before long, he was trailing Pam and Mike everywhere. He now has his own bed but, like the rest, prefers the furniture.

The chicks, too, are settling into luxury. They appear to be broiler hens, not layers, but on Petty Farm poultry lives out its natural life. The Pettys insist they are now at maximum capacity for dogs and chickens.

Who knows, though. When the next stray comes along, they may think: what's one more?
